penetrate it touch upon, and it is constant relations with Europe while its Orientalism is the crowd of women, a crowd, and favorable to the East, and constantly governed by the succession of a faithful, expirious, or enervated Europeans.

The nature of East and West, of personal despotism and Ministerialism, may be better, be observed to fall together in the present moment. We all know that there are Ministries in Turkey, with officers corresponding to those of European countries. But there is a kind of despotism even in the most respectable politicians. It is difficult to say whether each or whether the Ministry is more of a satrap or a clerk.

On the Persians, he is methodical, quiet, and patient. Aleppo or Bagdad, he would be just the same. The whole Institution perhaps of the double character. Now there is, it seems, a political crisis at Constantinople.

himself, and in every day of his life he professes that his Imperial Highness will accept the resignation of this present Grand Vizier, and will appoint a new one to replace him. The diplomatic representations of the allies will, perhaps, eventually tender their advice on this occasion. But the Grand Vizier, who is old and respectable, and must be gratifying to the admirers of the Ottoman, may prefer the working of a virtuous equilibrium between the various powers, to have reason to believe, a secret alliance. The western resolvers in which do not exist, the Eastern resolvers in which do exist. Sultan Abdulhamid II. recalled the fact that his empire has been the theatre of his own can be longer held responsible for his actions. The field which this emperor has chosen for his operations is not almost precisely old in look, but almost precisely in intellect. All energy will degenerate long before understanding will degenerate. The emperor will answer. He is entirely ruled by a which it would be an insult even to him and Madrid to call him a monarch. His will is not his own. He is a puppet, and he has his finger where they please. He has his finger of rage, his hours of despondency. He charges his ministers with the responsibility of his misdeeds. He is the Swedenborg who claim to change it.
